

IAM District 751 Statement on Boeing's New CEO

From IAM District 751 President Jon Holden:

What happens in the boardroom impacts our members on the shop floors, so any changes at that level are important to workers. Boeing's decision to appoint a new CEO who will be based in Seattle, close to the company's economic hub, is a step in the right direction. We hope this change will bring positive outcomes for our members and the company.

The incoming CEO of Boeing needs the support of the Machinists Union more than ever. We want to be an integral part of Boeing's vision for the future, and we are seeking a commitment from the company to identify and work to address the Quality Management System issues, together. The principles of safety and quality should be equally important as the manufacturing rates. This potential collaboration with the new CEO could be a prime opportunity for Boeing to prove its dedication to its workforce and acknowledge the exceptional manufacturing capability and capacity of skilled IAM Members on the shop floor.
